Before and After a Backyard Makeover

By Katie Fisk, Briar Bush Animal Curator

For the past 13 years, I have taught many audiences how to turn their backyards and outdoor spaces into mini oases for wildlife, all the while dreaming of the day when I would finally become a homeowner and could put my own ideas into practice. In March 2021, that dream came true when I purchased a home - a home with an overgrown, ugly backyard filled with invasive shrubs and vines. It was a perfect extreme remodeling project ideal for a gardening nerd such as myself!

With the help of Briar Bush Director, Mark Fallon, we started identifying the plants that were currently growing in the yard: a tangle of rose of Sharon, Asian bittersweet, climbing euonymus, and other aggressive invaders. These plants have little to no value for our native wildlife and will spread and take over an area, choking out native plants. They all had to go. Some people golf for fun, others knit, and some play video games; I found great joy every weekend for two months ripping invasive plants out of the ground. As a sweet irony, the invasives were wood chipped and became mulch for my garden.

On to the next step: planting the natives. My biggest priorities were food and shelter. Food comes in many forms, not just bird seed, and perhaps the most important is insects. By planting vegetation that insects love to eat, you are providing food to nearly every single creature you could want to attract, especially baby birds. Seeing chewed leaves is a good thing!
